He called for a mug of apple juice, The best there was in the larder; And he told his Committee "make no excuse, Every day it is growing harder !"

As the General sat by his own fireside In the midst of advisers three; friends-

Why can they not quiet be? Some ask me one thing some ask another, They bother me most to death; If I say yes and no to this, that, and 'tother, 'Twill surely take all of my breath!

If I say yes to the North, I am gone at the South, I'm glad that the nation's no wider; I declare I am very much down in the mouth, So give us a swig of that eider ! The Committee sat-not a word they said, But they keep up a terrible thinking; And they watched the nod of the old man's head

While the mug of hard cider was drinking! At length they spoke-"We've concluded, sir, That you answer no more of these letters; 'Tis strange how the People, poor, ignorant souls, Will constantly pester their betters,

You can hand them all over to us, North Bend, We'll be General for you awhile,-But we'll give you advice-the advice of a friend Drink cider-drink hard, or you'll spile !"

The General nodded, as wont to do, To this lordly Committee of Three, And ever since then the old man is mum, For a still small voice is he! Go down to North Bend the old hero you'll find, As jolly a coon as can be,

But question him not or he'll send you away To ask his Committee of Three !
